Kerry McNamara

Kerry McNamara is a retired mining engineer with more than 35 years of experience in exploration, mine engineering, project development, and construction management across gold, uranium, and potash operations in Canada. She has led mine engineering teams through both greenfield and brownfield projects, from early-stage studies to construction and commissioning.

Kerry is currently a sessional lecturer at the University of Saskatchewan, where she teaches Introduction to Mining and Mineral Processing and is passionate about helping students explore the breadth and diversity of the mining industry.
